Honolulu Letter.

Honotálu, H. I., July 27 :- Tomorrow I sail for Tokio and my next letter and those following will delve deeper into the queer things across the Pacific. There is so much in these islands however, that one could remain here for weeks, constantly Salem St. MARION, KY. finding something 'new to write about. Through my medical connection I was able to visit the leper settlement on the island of Molokai, and have been waking up with shudders ever since. It is a place so horrible that it would take a pen stronger and more subtle than mine to adequately describe it. I can tell how it impressed me, but I do not believe it possible to make anyone understand what it really looks like unless they see it.

Leprosy is believed by a majority of the medical world to be both contagious and infectious. but I have my doubts about the latter part of the theory. That it is contagious is proven over and over again on these islands, and nine out of ten of these poor unfortunates who are dragging out their toathsome lives on Molokai received the disease by contact with Many tales are told of natives who have fought against this imprisonment and have become outlaws, holding the authorities at bay for mapy months before they gave up. All the natives except the educated ones are on the side of the victim who has contracted the disease and do all in their power to prevent the officers from taking him to Molokai. One man who was touched with leprosy took his wife and little child to the mountains where they lived in a cave, defying the officers for more than a year. He was finally captured through his child who wandered away and was found by officers. Rather than be separated from his child the father and mother gave up and the entire The summer days are gone, and o er family went to the settlement.

There is a theory here that leprosy which is so prevalent is caused by eating raw fish. Natives eat a great I deal of raw fish, and this with poi, a peculiar custard made of tare root, forms the staple article of diet. Poi is the national dish and its use marks But up above, in realms where little class divisions among the people. If one went to Honolulu and missed taking a ride on a surf boat he would miss one of the greatest sports of the islands. Out at Waikiki, one of the most beautiful beaches in the world, the natives take their heavy surf boats far out on the ocean, and, watching for some especially big roller, start home with it, riding on in at express train speed, but if causes a free yet gentle action of the there be the slightest turn of the bowels trough which the told is forced bow there is an upset and a good ducking.
